

It's over at last - we moved on schedule!!!

At last the big day came and everything went from Lyndon the Cirrus. With great help from all of the family we did a lot of packing up of glassware, clothing, office supplies and an accumulation of 18 years of living in Mission Hills. On Wednesday, the 2nd we had lots of family help and much of the lighter stuff went to either the condo or the garage. On Thursday the movers came and moved all of the heavy stuff except the piano. Jeff arranged for its move, which was done with great difficulty. The rest of the stuff went fairly well, although the movers took longer than originally estimated, and finally unloaded the last item at about 7:30 p.m. The van was full, and they had to leave about a dozen boxes in the old garage. Of course, everything in the new place was in a total mess, with boxes everywhere, and total confusion as to where everything was. Fortunately, the entire family pitched in at various times, and by the weekend some measure of order had been restored. We never could have pulled it off except for the many, many hours put in by all of our children, and we thank them over and over for saving us from what otherwise would be a total disaster. Things still are pretty disorganized in the bedroom areas, and this RFNL must be brief and devoted mostly to pictures we were able to take during the move. Also, the RFNL files are still packed, and it will take a while for things to get back to some semblance of normality. Hence, the following pictures tell the story insofar as they can.
